To whom it may concern,

I have had the pleasure of working with Jeff Warner for the past three years at Scribendi. As the Senior Manager at Scribendi, I have had the primary responsibility for overseeing the freelance editors at the company and the editorial work completed for clients. During this period, Jeff has been one of our most prolific and proficient editors. While maintaining one of the higher volumes among hundreds of editors, his quality scores in our demanding service evaluations have always been high.

He has always approached his work with both enthusiasm and great dedication, taking a positive approach toward meeting both the client's needs and Scribendi's high standards. During this period, he has handled a broad range of clients on a huge variety of documents, highlighting the breadth of his editorial knowledge and experience. He shows great commitment to continual learning and constant improvement and personal development, something that has pushed him to excel.

Jeff's work with writers has included not only copy editing but also deep content editing, where a clear grasp of the complex underpinnings of the work is essential. Correct and clear text is a must, but an understanding of the author's style and voice—and a willingness to support them—is also a necessity, and Jeff has always done an excellent job in finding the editorial balance between science and art.

With regard to academics, Jeff has worked with top researchers in a number of fields, and he has helped authors improve their style and academic tone as they pursue publication, providing them with the necessary guidance to improve their work and to ensure their research is well grounded and well argued. In the final stages, correctness is vital for both grammar/syntax and the formatting of papers to meet any requested style requirements.

I believe Jeff Warner is an excellent candidate, with his passion for editing balanced by his deep knowledge and extensive experience. He would be a benefit to any company or project, someone committed not only to meeting his own goals but also to helping others meet theirs.

Kindest regards,

Bryan Russell, BA, BEd, MA
